How to download: From the app store.The present invention is generally directed to the development and improved delivery of products including radiation sensitive ingredients and, more particularly, to an improved method of developing and delivering such products by employing aqueous phase particle coating of the ingredients. In general, the reduction of human exposure to x-ray radiation has been a continuing concern to the medical profession and individuals for several decades. In the early 1900's the U.S. government began investigating radiation-shielding materials that could be placed between the x-ray source and the patient to shield the patient from x-ray radiation to reduce the radiation load on the patient. The development of x-ray film has not only increased the efficiency of this technique in that x-rays can be used to detect defects in the x-ray tube and the film has a half-life far exceeding that of the x-rays; but, it has also made the shielding of the patient a more effective precautionary measure. In the U.S., shielding has traditionally been in the form of lead or lead/thickened lead "lead aprons." As a result of the reduced level of radiation exposure, x-ray techniques have become much more popular and more widely used in general medicine, dental care, and for other diagnostic procedures. In fact, the use of x-ray diagnosis is about 5-10 times higher than the use of other non-invasive diagnostic techniques. This has increased the need for developing, refining, and manufacturing methods for the safe use of x-ray radiation. In the past, materials which reduce the x-ray radiation were 04aeff104c
